

Print this A3 size if possible

How to dress your warrior

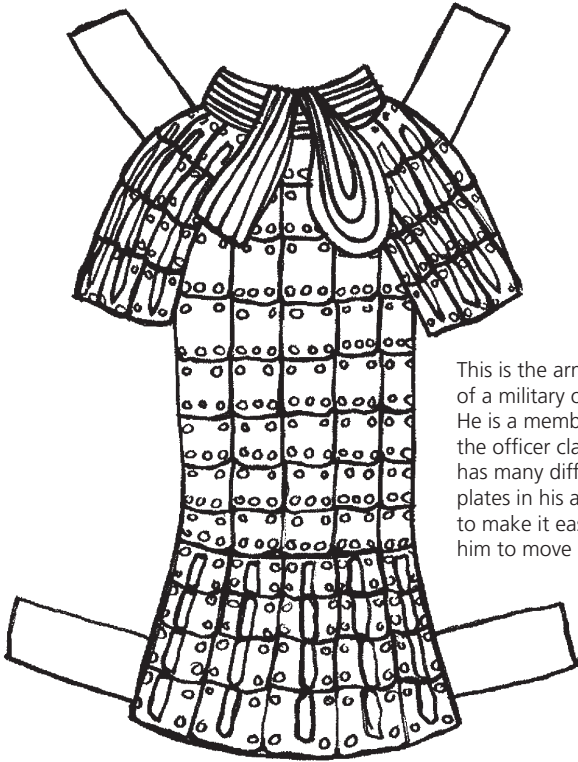

- 1. Cut out the warrior and horse and fold to make them stand up
- 2. Draw a face on the warrior – make him as scary as you like
- 3. Cut out the different suits of armour and fold back the tabs
- 4. Carefully place the armour onto the warrior and change them to make him into different types
- 5. At home, colour in your warrior, horse and armour in bright colours

Your warrior is ready to guard the emperor's tomb!

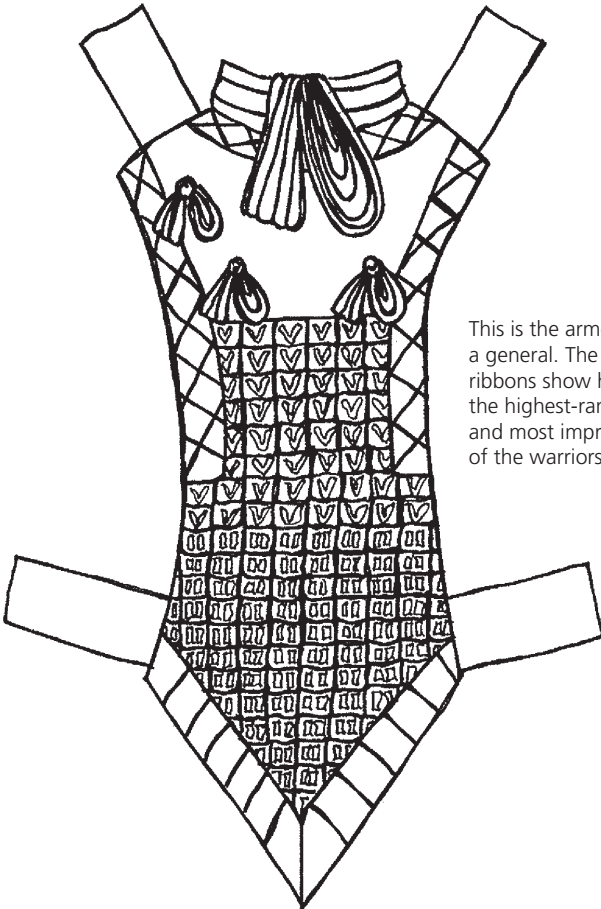

arty.fact

Every warrior in the terracotta army had a different face and was brightly coloured. Over time the colour has worn away and only traces remain.

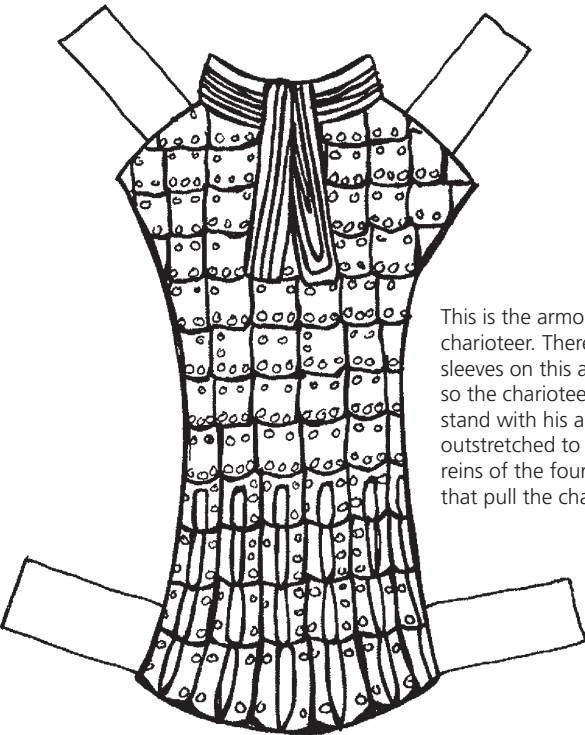

This cavalry horse has a fitted saddle and would have been ridden by a warrior called a cavalymen. There are no stirrups for the rider's feet, so he would have had to grip hard with his knees when charging into battle!

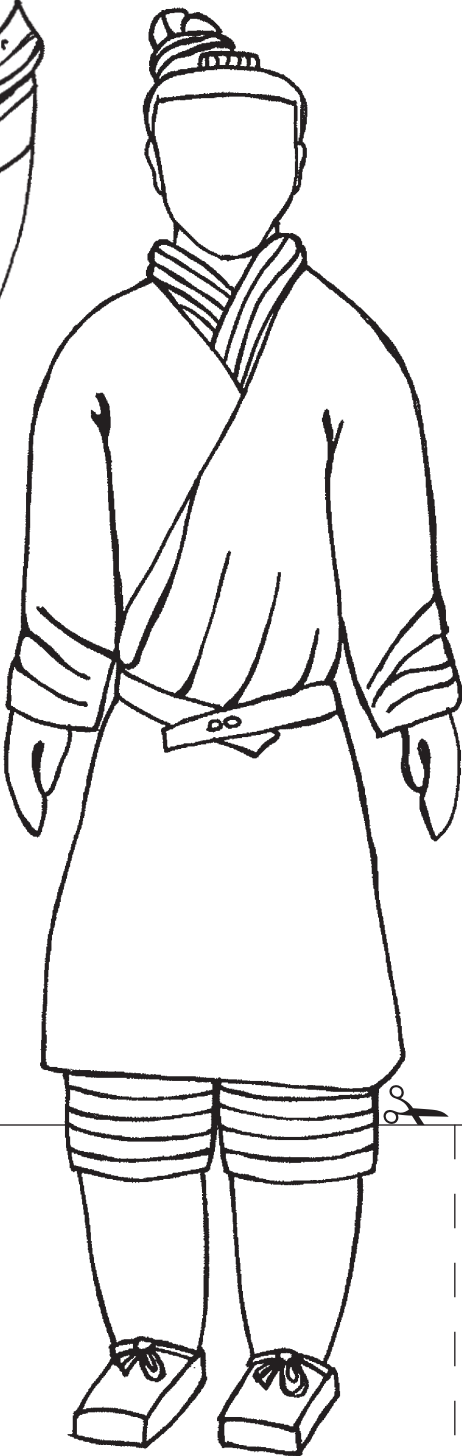

This is the armour of a military officer. He is a member of the officer class and has many different plates in his armour to make it easier for him to move and fight.

This is the armour of a general. The three ribbons show he is the highest-ranking and most impressive of the warriors.

This is the armour of a charioteer. There are no sleeves on this armour so the charioteer can stand with his arms outstretched to hold the reins of the four horses that pull the chariot.

This warrior wears a simple folded robe. To make him into a general, military officer or charioteer you need to dress him in armour.

